

Review: Kate Hopkins, Plaasmoorde-The Killing Fields, Rebel News Network Ltd, Toronto, Ontario, 2018

Pages: 70

“Kill the Boer”

The author risked much in bringing the near-hopeless plight of white South African farmers to light, attractive targets in a country with a murder rate of 20,000 per annum or number ten in the world.

Two personal stories are the centrepiece of this book: Bernard, whose father was beaten and managed to help him before dying, and an old woman Marietta whose face was blasted with a shotgun. In both cases black gang members were the perpetrators.

Personalising victims makes this genocide harder for the liberal western media to ignore, and the state of living in perpetual fear which vulnerable widows and children endure seems even worse than the killings.

As Zimbabwe did in 2000, the black African National Congress (ANC) and Economic Freedom Fighters (EFF) South African powers that be are extinguishing their white minority, who in the end will make a last stand and die in their own land.

I) Introduction: Why South Africa

In 2017 there were 84 white farmer murders.

Bernard’s father was brutally murdered in a farm attack.

II) The Crosses of Plaasmoorde

The Transvaal Agricultural Union maintains a map with pins attached to each location of a white farmer murder. At Plaasmoorde in Ysterberg, a white metal cross is hammered into the hillside rock as a memorial for each victim.

II) Left for Dead-Twice

The African National Congress (ANC) and Economic Freedom Fighters (EFF) inculcate black hospital workers that their white employers are the enemy.

Marietta had her lower jaw blown off by a shotgun, then a botched skin graft operation from her leg which was attached the wrong way causing painful ingrown hairs.

III) Here, the Night Monsters Are Real

IV) If He Is a Brother, Then He Will Be Let Go

There are more corrupt police officers than good ones in South Africa. In exchange for providing police weapons and/or acting as a safety deposit house for stolen white farmer property, corrupt officers receive a cut from black gangs.

South African agricultural production has shrunk by 24% and for the first time in history is a net food importer.

A survivalist group called the Suidlanders are training for a last stand, hearkening back to the 1838 Battle of Blood River, where 470 pioneers fought against 15,000 Zulus.

ANC leader Cyril Ramaphosa implemented the white-farmer land-confiscation policy.

Weapons training is standard for farmers' wives.

Some South African farms use miles of electrified fencing.

V) Why Don't They Just Go

Most white farmers are incredibly poor and their main asset, the land, is illiquid and subject to new confiscation laws. There are also often heavy bank loans to pay.

Some attack victims leave their home in an unrepaired state as a deterrent to future attacks.

400,000 white South Africans are said to live in squalid slums with open sewers. Even after Apartheid, in a Pretorian slum whites and blacks don't mix with children attending different schools.

There is no electricity, water, or law and order for anyone.

New affirmative action laws prohibit white employment if a suitability qualified black person exists.

VI) The Biggest Threat to the White Farmer Are His Disgruntled Workers

Black farm hands receive about USD11 per day.

There are stories of black farmer mistreatment.

Black gangs pitch a better life for workers if they betray the defence secrets of farms.

VII) I Do This Tonight, so That Tomorrow Night I Can Sleep Safely

From April 2017 to March 2018, 20,336 people were murdered.

South Africa is #10 in the world for homicides (the US is #87).

The South Africa Hunters Association was 300,000 firearm holders and the ANC has gun-confiscation legislation in the pipeline.

VIII) How I Became a Non-Person